

Ours "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S. Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

Saliency "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S. Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

Guided Backprop. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S. Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

Int. Gradients "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S.Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

DeepLIFT "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S.Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

DeepLIFT-SHAP "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S. Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'

Gradient-SHAP "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating. U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, D-Calif., was asked to explain her 2005 vote to offer gun manufacturers liability protections during a debate in the U.S. Senate race. Sanchez never really directly answered the question but said that the law didn't give gun manufacturers "blanket immunity." She then pivoted to talk about her support from the nation's leading gun control group, the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. "The Brady Campaign has given me a 100 percent, not 99, 100 percent rating," Sanchez said May 10, 2016. "They say I'm not a lap dog to the gun lobby, and they say I don't take their money." The Brady Campaign did say that. But they said a lot of other things -- including some not-so-positive comments on Sanchez's 2005 vote. We'll walk you through it. Sanchez on gun issues While Sanchez supports several gun-control measures, such as a mandatory waiting period, a ban on high-capacity magazines and universal background checks, she did vote for the 2005 bill that granted gun makers immunity from lawsuits based on the misuse of their products. To many in the gun control community, this is a blemish on her record, and in April, Sanchez wrote an op-ed in the Sacramento Bee defending that vote. She noted that the full package included some gun control measures, but it was her concern for "unintended consequences" that played as large a role. "I voted for it to prevent frivolous lawsuits against manufacturers," Sanchez said. "If someone uses a baseball bat or hammer to assault you, should the manufacturers be held criminally liable? If you said no, then you agree with the principle behind the 2005 law." The Brady Campaign wasn't buying it. Four days after Sanchez's op-ed, the organization issued a press release. "Loretta Sanchez is dead wrong," said Dan Gross, president of the Brady Campaign. "I find it excruciatingly frustrating that she claimed to have 'fully analyzed unintended consequences' of the law and saw fit to support it nonetheless." Gross said unlike an auto maker who can be sued, the victims of gun violence have no legal recourse. Featured Fact-check Instagram posts stated on October 17, 2022 in an Instagram post There were two shooters in the 2017 Las Vegas mass shooting. By Ciara O'