

Ours "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

Saliency "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

Guided Backprop. "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

Int. Gradients "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term "radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

DeepLIFT "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term "radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

DeepLIFT-SHAP "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to

Gradient-SHAP "These are radical Islamic terrorists, and (Hillary Clinton) won't even mention the word. In response to a question by a Muslim woman about anti-Muslim bias during the town hall presidential debate, Donald Trump said that the United States has a problem with "radical Islamic terrorists," citing mass shootings in Orlando and San Bernardino. Trump then said that Hillary Clinton and President Barack Obama won't correctly define the problem. "These are radical Islamic terrorists and she won't even mention the word, and nor will President Obama. He won't use the term radical Islamic terrorism," Trump said during the Oct. 9 debate at Washington University in St. Louis. "Now, to solve a problem, you have to be able to state what the problem is or at least say the name. She won't say the name and President Obama won't say the name. But the name is there. It's radical Islamic terror." In her response, Clinton used the phrase "violent jihadist terrorists" and said that the United States is not at war with Islam. "And it is a mistake, and it plays into the hands of the terrorists to act as though we are," she said. We've looked at Obama's use of the term before; he doesn't like to use it. For this fact-check, we will look at how Clinton describes radical Islamic terrorism. Clinton's words The day after the mass shooting in Orlando, Clinton did a series of interviews in which she said she had no problem using the term "radical Islamism" or "radical jihadist terrorism." But she also said that the phrases were not "magic words" that would halt terrorism. "From my perspective, it matters what we do more than what we say. And you know, it mattered we got bin Laden, not what name we called him," she said on CNN on June 13. "Whether you call it radical jihadism or radical Islamism, I'm happy to say either. I think they mean the same thing." Clinton emphasizes a distinction between a "distorted version of Islam" and the religion itself. "What I won't do, because I think it is dangerous for our efforts to defeat this threat, is to demonize and demagogue and, you know, declare war on an entire religion. That plays right into ISIS' hands," she said. "We can call it radical jihadism, we can call it radical Islamism. But we also want to reach out to