

Ours "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she♦♦s in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation♦♦s immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they♦♦d reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi♦♦s spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn♦♦t mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here♦♦s the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers

Saliency "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she♦♦s in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation♦♦s immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they♦♦d reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers

Guided Backprop. "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she's in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation's immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they'd reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation.

Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers

Int. Gradients "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she's in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation's immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they'd reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers DeepLIFT "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she's in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation's immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they'd reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers

DeepLIFT-SHAP "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she's in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation's immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they'd reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers

Gradient-SHAP "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that. Though she's in the minority in the Republican-controlled Congress, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., gained newfound clout last week in shaping the nation's immigration policy. She and Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer announced they'd reached a deal with President Trump on protecting the Dreamers. The Dreamers are the 800,000 young people brought to the U.S. illegally as children and temporarily shielded from deportation under the Obama-era DACA program. About one quarter live in California. This week, Pelosi claimed three-quarters of Americans support what she described as the legislative solution for safeguarding Dreamers from deportation: the DREAM Act. First introduced in 2001, the DREAM Act is a bipartisan bill that would offer protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally as children as long as they meet certain requirements. It would also include a path to citizenship for those who graduate from U.S. high schools and attend college, enter the workforce, or enlist in a military program. Pelosi made her claim during a speech Sept. 18, 2017 at Sacramento State University: "Seventy-six percent of the American people support us passing the DREAM Act ... with citizenship and legalization as part of it all. ... More than 60 percent of Republicans support that." We interpreted the second portion of her statement, about citizenship and legalization, to mean Americans are comfortable with one or the other option, particularly for immigrants brought to the U.S. illegally as children. Given the heated debate around immigration, we wanted to know whether such a large share of Americans really support the DREAM Act, or at least the key provisions of the bill. We set out on a fact check. Our research As evidence for the claim, Pelosi's spokesman pointed to a Politico/Morning Consult poll conducted Aug. 31 through Sept. 3, 2017. The poll includes responses from nearly 2,000 registered voters. The questions didn't mention the DREAM Act specifically, but instead asked about the main thrust of the legislation. Here's the question that got the closest: "As you may know, Dreamers are young people who were brought to the United States illegally when they were children, often with their parents. Which of the following do you think is the best way to handle Dreamers?" • 58 percent said Dreamers