

Ours "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That's what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration's stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated better than military veterans. By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That's significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration's proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to

Saliency "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That's what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration's stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated better than military veterans. By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That's significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration's proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to

Guided Backprop. "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That's what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration's stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated better than military veterans. ♦♦ By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That ♦♦s significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration ♦♦s proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to

Int. Gradients "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That ♦♦s what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration ♦♦s stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated ♦♦better than military veterans. ♦♦ By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That ♦♦s significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration ♦♦s proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to DeepLIFT "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That's what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration's stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated better than military veterans. By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That's significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration's proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to DeepLIFT-SHAP "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That's what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration's stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn't changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated ♦♦better than military veterans.♦♦ By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That♦♦s significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration♦♦s proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to

Gradient-SHAP "Somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of" the citizenship question in the census A day after President Donald Trump called off his bid to add a question to the 2020 census asking about U.S. citizenship status, radio host Rush Limbaugh slammed Democrats for opposing the question. "The real controversy here is, who took the citizenship question off of the census, and why?" Limbaugh said during an appearance on "Fox & Friends." "It would seem to me that this kind of attention should have been asked when somebody in the Obama regime decided to get rid of it." Limbaugh had his facts twisted, however, as the citizenship question did not disappear entirely under former President Barack Obama. That♦♦s what our state partners at PolitiFact North Carolina determined when they checked a similar claim from Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., in April. Some things have changed since then. The Supreme Court rejected the Trump administration♦♦s stated reason for including a citizenship question in June. On July 11, Trump ordered all federal agencies to hand over to the Commerce Department any information on the number of non-citizens in the United States. What hasn♦♦t changed is the history of the census citizenship question. A brief history The census has been conducted every decade since 1790 to get a national population count used to determine the distribution of seats in Congress. A citizenship question first showed up in the census in 1820, and again in 1830, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. In 1870, the question was asked of males ages 21 and older, and it has appeared in some form as a question for all respondents every decade since 1890, with the exception of 1960. But the last time the Census Bureau asked every household about citizenship was in 1950, when census workers knocking on doors wrote down where each person was born and asked as a follow-up, "If foreign born — is he naturalized?" Featured Fact-check Blake Masters stated on October 15, 2022 in a tweet Immigrants illegally in the country are treated ♦♦better than military veterans.♦♦ By Jon Greenberg • October 21, 2022 That♦♦s significant because had its efforts not been thwarted by the Supreme Court, the Trump administration♦♦s proposal would have asked the citizenship question of all American households. After 1950, the 1960 census inquired about place of birth but not about citizenship. Then, beginning in 1970, the Census Bureau began distributing two different questionnaires: A short form sent to most households and a long form sent only to